Syrien: Save the Children fordert dringend Zugang zu Familien in den umkämpften Gebieten im Süden des Landes

Berlin, 13. Juli 2018. Die Kinderrechtsorganisation Save the Children fordert einen Waffenstillstand und sofortigen humanitären Zugang zu Kindern, die durch Kämpfe in Daraa im Südwesten Syriens vertrieben wurden. Zehntausende Zivilisten mussten in der glühenden Sommerhitze nach Quneitra an der Grenze zu den besetzten Golanhöhen und Teilen des westlichen Daraa fliehen.

Caroline Anning von Save the Children erklärte dazu: „Die durch die Gewalt in Daraa in den vergangenen Wochen ausgelöste Vertreibung ist die höchste, die wir in so kurzer Zeit seit Beginn des Krieges vor mehr als sieben Jahren gesehen haben. Kinder sind immer noch in Gebieten mit schweren Kämpfen gefangen, und Zehntausende vertriebener Familien brauchen dringend lebensrettende Unterstützung.“

Save the Children is calling for a ceasefire and urgent humanitarian access to children displaced by fighting in Dera'a in southwestern Syria. Tens of thousands of civilians have been displaced to Quneitra on the border with the Occupied Golan Heights and parts of Western Dera'a under the blazing summer heat.

The humanitarian needs among displaced communities are huge. There's a critical shortage of tents and mattresses, clean water, food and medical care. Amid temperatures of up to 45 degrees several children are reported to have died from dehydration, heatstroke and scorpion bites, according to the UN.

Currently, no cross-border humanitarian access is possible from either Jordan or Israel, and no aid has been able to reach these areas from other parts of Syria. Syrian humanitarian workers who were displaced themselves are doing everything they can to provide life-saving support, but are struggling with limited supplies and insecurity.

Save the Children's partners are still responding in parts of west Dera'a and the organization is scaling up a short-term emergency response in Quneitra, providing relief supplies and psychosocial support, nutrition and informal education for children.

Caroline Anning, Save the Children's Syria Response Director, said: “The displacement created by the violence in Dera'a in the last few weeks is the highest we've seen in a short space of time since the war started more than seven years ago. Children are still trapped in areas with heavy fighting, and tens of thousands of displaced families need urgent life-saving support.

“Tens of thousands of displaced families are scattered in remote border areas where there are barely even trees to protect them from the blazing sun. Save the Children partners distributing emergency relief supplies and tell us the situation is dire, with desperate parents struggling to cope. There are no tents, toilets or running water and everyone is exhausted, both physically and mentally. Many children are showing symptoms of heat stroke, and people are getting sick from being forced to drink dirty water from irrigation pipes.”

“It is vital that parties to the conflict and neighbouring states facilitate access to humanitarian aid across borders and across frontlines, commit to protect civilians and humanitarian workers, and stop devastating attacks on civilian areas and infrastructure such as schools and hospitals.”
